Tech results fail to fire up traders with sky-high expectations

Bloomberg
feedback@livemint.com

Investors had hoped earnings from five of the world's biggest companies would shake the stocks out of a malaise and provide a fresh jolt for the S&P 500.

Instead, in many cases they were left wanting.

While Microsoft, Apple, Alphabet, Amazon and Meta Platforms all topped analyst expectations for sales and profits last week, the results weren't strong enough to justify their lofty multiples relative to the broader market.

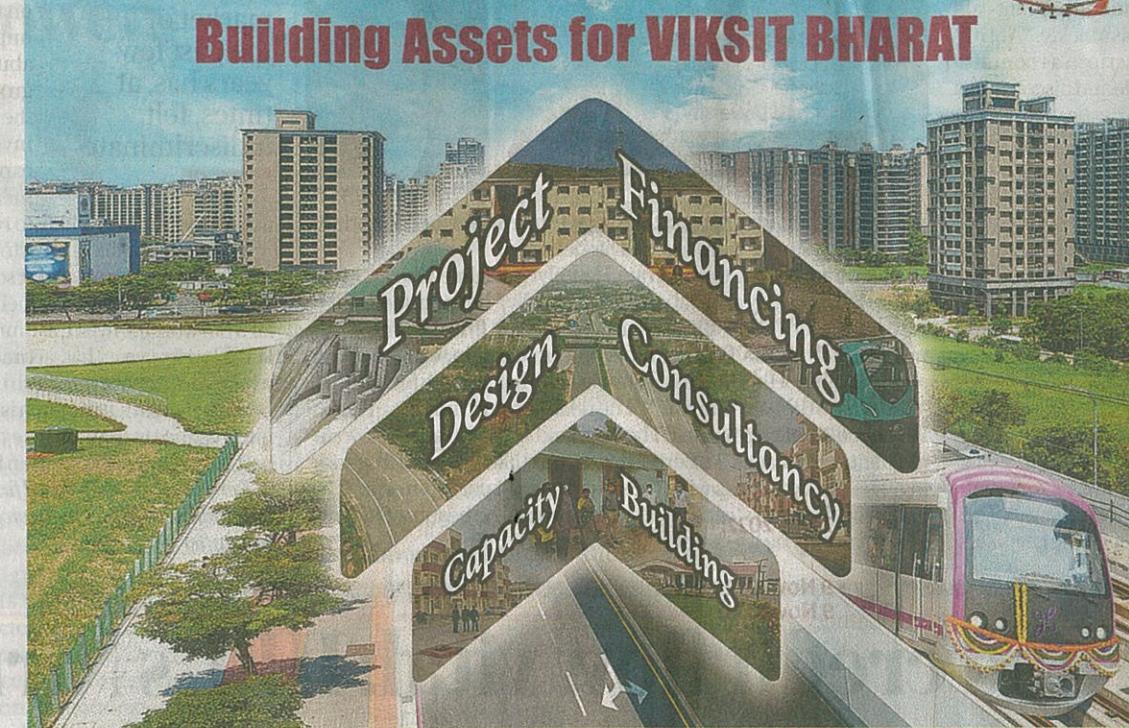

With few reasons to bid up the group, technology investors hit the sell button, resulting in a 1.8% drop in the Bloomberg Magnificent 7 Index, with only Alphabet and Amazon ending the week in the green. The S&P 500 fell 1.4%, weighed down by the big-tech group.

"Investors had higher numbers in mind," said Michael Casper, equity strategist at Bloomberg Intelligence. "They're expecting more from AI and these AI projects than what they've gotten so far."

The issue isn't the current quarter per se: the group of seven companies is on track to deliver profit growth of 30% in three-month period through September, which would beat the estimate of 18% at the start of earnings season, according to data compiled by Bloomberg Intelligence.

The trouble is next year's profit outlook remains murky with the tech giants continuing to spend heavily on infrastructure to support more AI computing power. Analysts have been cutting their 2025 profit-growth projections for the Magnificent Seven cohort since earnings season began more than two weeks ago.
